What's new:

/9/13, LATE/LATE WEDNESDAY; VARIOUS TYPES OF CORPORATE SUPPORT The firebase season was more active this past week, with two Cuban MIG-29 Fulcrums reporting in seemingly endangered Task Force 68. Intercepts indicated that one was in the Cuban Air Force 23rd Aerial Weapons group (Key 4 days ago), and the other was supposedly on preconfigured alert at Havana international airport (Key 9 days ago). Analysis This is the second time in two months that 22 Cuban Fulcrums have been reported south of the Straights of Florida (always with press over photos; there were no HELICON/Aware reports for these interceptions), and one of the two Havana sightings was the first indication of its presence south of the Straights of Florida in almost four years. Last week's Cuban MIG-29s were most likely 24th Attack Squadron 4, which has stayed in the vicinity of Havana for almost a month. While the Fulcrum's mission is not known, the radar emissions suggest that is there for an adversary "training" role. The Fulcrums are being operated out of Havana Comandancia de Helicopteros Ligados, with likely Detachment Cuba. The 22 Fulcrums report this week makes an important contribution to the understanding of the threat posed by Cuba's Air Force. As we have reported for over two years, the Cuban Air Force has at least three elements in its inventory: a close air support option, a strike capability and an adversary option (aka Russian or RUB/KREMLIN). There is no doubt that the Soviets remain committed to the Alliance, building a new generation of MiG-29s and Tupolev-160s, while providing it with Aerospatiale SA-11 and 5 generations of airborne laser (ABL). Cuba's three elements are outlined in blue below; the close air support and ground attack are evident in the primitive nature of the radar emissions, but it is the adversary element that demonstrates the growing commitment of Cuba. Unfortunately, we don't know many details about the Fulcrums, but the growing traffic in and out of the Havana air base suggests some sort of training activity, and a little glance at the Fulcrum's mission reveals a variety of roles for the Cubans.
