I want to do this in a function, and the variable is to be used later in my other functions. I tried the following, but it doesn't give me the current time import time def function(): time.sleep(0.10) var = time.time() #do something with var A: Try this. I am using time.clock() and time.time() def function(): t1 = time.clock() .... t2 = time.time() .... print t1 - t2 A: I found that using time.clock() works well for me. However, if I use time.sleep(10) then time.clock() always returns 0. However, even using a different time function time.time() I get problems. I finally discovered that the problem was I had two different timescales going on b7e8fdf5c8
