HAMY C-200 Wireless Camera driverLilac-Colored Leaf on the Maple Syrup Plant My buddy John introduced me to the sweet, marvelous joy that is Maple Syrup on our campus a year or two ago. I like it when I smell it as I go to class, just like when I get a whiff of the lilac blossoms on the trees and shrubs in spring. I cannot reliably taste it if I am too distant from it, but then again, I can taste coffee, lemon juice, and other things a few feet away, too, because I smell them. The aroma of coffee and lemon juice, for instance, are very nice, but I can't actually eat either. So, it makes me wonder, what causes the sweet smell? I was reading an article in the International Science and Technology today that is written by a Ph.D. biologist who gave it some thought. I have a question for the biologist who wrote that article. Do you know what causes the sweet smell that comes from maple syrup? After a bit of thought, I guess it has something to do with the amino acid proline. Another blogger who has studied maple syrup has stated that the sweetness in maple syrup is a function of a chain reaction that starts with the amino acid proline. The article from I.S.I.T. offered a biological explanation for the development of maple syrup — and also for maple trees: Map
