Evidence for NPY-immunoreactive gonadotropin-releasing hormone (GnRH) neurons: indirect evidence for a role of the GnRH-NPY system in GnRH pulsatility. Neuropeptide Y (NPY)-immunoreactive (IR) neurons have been shown to be concentrated in specific hypothalamic areas, including the ventrolateral periventricular nucleus (PeN), area externa, and the medial preoptic area (mPOA). Other hypothalamic areas such as the mediobasal and basomedial nuclei are devoid of NPY-IR neurons. In the present study we investigated if NPY-IR neurons exert direct control over pituitary gonadotropin secretion. Administration of a rabbit antiserum (anti-NPY) raised against NPY-bovine pancreatic polypeptide (10 microliters intracisternally) in adult female rats caused a significant increase in plasma LH on the day of antiserum treatment (day 0), whereas plasma FSH remained unaffected. The LH increase was maximal on day 1 and almost completely suppressed on day 2. Plasma LH and FSH returned to pretreatment levels in animals treated with IgG isotype-control serum. Plasma PRL remained at control levels during the entire experiment. The anti-NPY serum treatment reduced hypothalamic NPY-IR density (mean \pm SE) to 60.0 ± 10.4 perikarya/ 0.500 mm^2 (compared to 89.5 ± 7.2 perikarya/ 0.500 mm^2 in controls), as measured by the silver stain of NPY-IR neurons. A similar reduction of hypothal
