Glucocorticoids and the metabolic fate of docosahexaenoate in human monocyte-derived macrophages. The objective of this study was to determine the effect of glucocorticoids on the biosynthesis, catabolism, and turnover of docosahexaenoate (22:6n-3, DHA) in human monocyte-derived macrophages. Macrophages were incubated in control medium, human plasma, or dexamethasone (DEX) medium for 4 h, and DHA incorporation and catabolism were examined by gas chromatography mass spectrometry. The bioactivity of the medium-derived DHA in macrophages was determined by measuring prostaglandin E(2) (PGE(2)) release. When incubated in human plasma, macrophages incorporated 20% of the incorporated DHA into phospholipids and 80% into triacylglycerols. Incorporation was inhibited by 75% in the presence of 1 mM exogenous DHA and by 50% in the presence of 1 mM exogenous linoleic acid. Incorporation of other polyunsaturated fatty acids (PUFA) was unaffected. When incubated with 1 mM exogenous DHA in the presence of DEX, incorporation was reduced by 50%. Similarly, catabolism was inhibited by 50% in the presence of 1 mM exogenous DHA and by 75% in the presence of 1 mM exogenous linoleic acid. In the presence of 1 mM exogenous DHA, catabolism was reduced by 75% in the absence and by 50% in the presence of DEX, whereas catabolism of palmitate or oleate was unaffected. Incubation of 1 mM DHA in the presence of DEX decreased PGE(2) release by 40%. DHA is incorporated and catabolized in human monocyte-derived macrophages, and glucocorticoids inhibit the catabolism.
